Neighbourhood Support in Farming Adds Value to NAAC A++ Accreditation

The support and involvement of neighbors in farming practices have become a significant factor in achieving NAAC A++ accreditation for the college. The accreditation process conducted by the National Assessment and Accreditation Council acknowledges the importance of community engagement in educational institutions, including agriculture-related programs.

Neighbors playing an active role in farming activities not only showcases a collaborative approach but also adds value to the accreditation process. This support highlights the institution's ability to establish strong community connections and promote sustainable agricultural practices.

Through the assistance of neighbors in farming, educational institutions can demonstrate hands-on learning experiences, knowledge exchange, and the implementation of innovative farming techniques. The involvement of local communities fosters a sense of belonging and cultivates a learning environment that extends beyond the boundaries of the institution.

NAAC recognizes the impact of community participation in promoting holistic development, practical learning, and fostering a sense of social responsibility among students.
